Many experts believe we will soon face a global shortage of one of our most precious resources – fresh water. Such a crisis can be avoided, but only if we start thinking seriously about how to conserve water and stop behaving as though it was available in unlimited quantities.

Just as the oil crisis of the 70s forced us to accept the fact that one day our supply of fossil fuels will run out, the future water crisis will force us to change the way we view this resource. If we wait until the crisis is upon us, the adjustments could be very painful. But we have the advantage of being able to see it coming more clearly than we could have predicted the oil crisis. The world's supply of oil is underground. So it is very difficult to judge accurately how much there really is. Fresh water is a different matter. Though there are underground supplies, most of it is visible above ground. We can more easily predict when our demand will exceed the supply.

To encourage conservation, governments should start charging for water at levels that reflect its true value. But no matter what other steps governments take to get control of the problem, they must change their basic approach to managing water use. Rather than spread responsibility among local, regional, and national agencies, they should set up central authorities to coordinate water policy.

31. According to the passage, why is the world facing a water crisis?
- A. Only a small amount of the world's water can be used.
 - B. The world population is steadily increasing.
 - C. Much of the world's fresh water has been seriously polluted.
 - D. We don't value water highly enough.
32. As indicated in the passage, the water problem
- A. is already extremely serious.
 - B. has been exaggerated.
 - C. will not necessarily happen.
 - D. is underestimated by governments.
33. How is the water crisis different from the oil crisis?
- A. There is more water than oil.
 - B. We can estimate the supply of water more accurately.
 - C. People take the water crisis more seriously.
 - D. Governments are taking longer to respond.
34. According to the author, how should the price of water be changed?
- A. It should be reduced.
 - B. It should be the same everywhere.
 - C. It should be raised.
 - D. It should be different from season to season.
35. What is wrong with the way governments manage water supplies?
- A. Too few people have authority.
 - B. Policy changes happen too often.
 - C. Too many organizations have influence.
 - D. Governments don't force people to follow regulations.
